A STRANGE CHRISTIAN

Once upon a time there was a man who called himself a Christian. But he was indeed a strange one.

On Monday while he was at work, something went wrong. He forgot about God and cursed using the name of God freely.

On Tuesday he heard something evil about a brother and he passed it on without taking the trouble or time to determine whether it was true or not. He even made the story a little worse than when he heard it.

On Wednesday while making a business transaction, he saw an opportunity to take advantage of a customer and he did it for the few dollars involved.

On Thursday he went to a friend's home for a little game of cards – he didn't lose much. Naturally there was a cocktail and a couple of beers. “A very cheap night's entertainment,” he said.

On Friday he became angry at everyone with whom he was working. They could not see that all ought to be done his way and he told them off – good!

On Saturday his grocer made a mistake and did not charge him for a pound of butter. He said this was the grocer's fault.

On Sunday morning he went to church, took part in the services – the part where one sits in the pew and mutters to himself that the service was too long. That night he stayed home so he would be ready for another week. This man was indeed a strange Christian.
