Blasphemous Theory #2: Evolution

The Theory of Evolution by Natural Selection was thrust into mainstream modern science when Charles Darwin authored On the Origin of Species in 1859. In his 552-page tome, Darwin proposed that all species of plants, animals (including humans), insects, and microorganisms evolved from a "primordial form" over the course of tens of millions of years.

Scientists don't really know how many unique species exist on Earth today, but the estimates range from 10 million to one trillion (not including the millions of extinct species). That's a lot of highly-diverse and extremely-divergent life forms. In my thinking, believing that primordial forms separately "evolved" into a mosquito, an oak tree, and a giraffe takes a lot more faith than believing in our Supreme Creator.

Further, the fossil record clearly shows the Cambrian Explosion when millions of fully-developed species suddenly appear with no precursor organisms. Charles Darwin couldn't explain this "evolution anomaly" in his book. And, it caused him to seriously question the very theory he had emphatically defended.

Since the publication of On the Origin of Species, Darwin's life's work has taken quite a beating. And, discovered among his private papers after his death was a 300,000-word manuscript that was to be the sequel to his 1859 volume. It was to provide sound empirical evidence that finally proved his theory. It was never published because he found no such proof.

As we read in Genesis 6:19-20, Noah brought upon the ark two of every kind. For example, one such kind was Canis (Latin for canine). Each of those two animals – in God's perfect design – contains within its DNA 2.8 billion base pairs, the recipe for begetting every type of "dog" imaginable. Wolf. Coyote. Black Labrador. Isn't God's design simpler? And more believable?
